Climate change has important implications for the future of children and young people. However, they have the least power to limit harm and effect positive change which makes them vulnerable to climate anxiety.

Schools are well placed to help students manage their eco-anxiety by providing opportunities for students to work with others in taking climate and ecological action. In this panel discussion students will be discussing the individual projects they have been running in their schools and community. Students will be speaking about their Nature Trail & Nature Room, Climate Cafe, Plant a Planet Campaign and their Environmental Influencer Course.
